Dear Mr. Casey:

The Editorial Board of the Detroit College of Law Review would like to take this opportunity to invite you to participate in an upcoming discussion on reform in the law. Your participation would entail the authoring of a short, informal essay dealing with an area of the law which you feel is in need of reform. Additionally, we hope that you will propose whatever changes you feel are necessary to alleviate the problems you identify.

The Detroit College of Law Review will be collecting these essays from various scholars, governmental officials, and members of the judiciary. This collection will appear in Issue IV, Volume 1983 of the Detroit College of Law Review under the title: REFORMS IN THE LAW: AN OPEN FORUM. Prospective authors should be mindful that this collection of essays will be read by a diverse group of individuals representing both the academic world and legal practitioners. As such, your ideas and proposals will be given serious consideration by those who are in a position to implement changes in the law. Law Reviews traditionally deal with recent developments in the law; this project is structured to go beyond an analysis of things which have already occurred and will attempt to identify needed changes.

Essays need not be in any particular form. They should be short and to the point. We contemplate essays of between 1,000 and 4,000 words; they need not be footnoted. These essays should discuss current problems in the law and, while not necessarily outlining a program for change, they should at least indicate new directions to be pursued.

We hope that you will take this opportunity to join with us in a discussion on reform. Critical self-examination is essential to democratic institutions; discussions on reform thus stand as one of the highest forms of participation in the democratic process.

Thank you in advance for considering our request. Please fill out the enclosed form and return it to us as soon as possible. If you have any questions, please contact us directly.
